Numerous weekly and monthly papers and periodicals are also published in San Jose.

There are three papers published in Gilroy, two in Los Gatos, two in Palo Alto (besides two published by the students of Stanford University), two in Santa Clara, and one each in Campbell, Morgan Hill and Mountain View.

thirty miles south, and Palo Alto, the seat of Stanford University. Numerous smaller but prosperous and enterprising towns dot the county, furnishing nuclei for its horticultural and agricultural development. All these towns are connected with San Jose and San Francisco by railroad and by telegraph and telephone lines. The principal ones have systems of water supply and electric light and power. Fruit farms as a rule are small, a great majority being from ten to twenty-five acres. This promotes the general prosperity, giving a heavy rural as compared with the active urban population. The thousands of retired capitalists living in towns make their population apparently excessive.
