North San Juan, Nevada Co, P O 13 miles n of Nevada City, is reached by stage from the Central Pacific Railroad at Colfax, via Nevada, being within a day's ride of San Francisco. Two daily lines also connect it with Marysville, 40 miles distant, a daily line to Camptonville and Downsville, two tri-weekly lines to Columbia Hill and North Bloomfield, and one to Alhambra. The population numbers about 1,200. This is a representative town of the northern mining region. Being at an elevation of about two thousand feet, in the verge of the belt covered by deep snows in winter, it has a climate where frosts are but slightly felt, and most favorable to vigorous health. The location is upon a high ridge on the south side of the Middle Yuba, where a point sets off, holding a gravel bed, or deposit of auriferous drift, about four thousand feet in length, by an average of one thousand in width, and a depth of one hundred and fifty feet. This gravel deposit constitutes the former resource of the place, but has been mostly washed away by the "hydraulic" process, yielding an enormous amount since the mines were first prospected in 1853. These productive mines required extraordinary expenditures in opening and operating, thus creating a prosperous community. The village occupies a most level site, is well built, containing a number of substantial fire-proof houses, and being on fertile soil, by the good taste and industry of its citizens, fruit trees, vines and flowering shrubs were planted, now constituting a source of profit and embowering the home-like residences in pleasant verdure. North San Juan, from its situation on lines of travel, commands considerable trade from the mining and agricultural communities along the "ridge," these being Sebastopol, Sweetland and Birchville on the west, and Cherokee, Columbia Hill and North Bloomfield on the east. The surrounding country was once densely covered with towering pines and broad-spreading oaks, which, as they are cleared away leave a soil well adapted to the production of fruit trees and vines. Apples, peaches, pears, etc., of excellent quality, are grown, and a large quantity of wine is annually made. One newspaper, the Times, is published weekly.
