

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO., Bookbinders and Job Printers, corner of Clay and Leidesdorff.

woolen factory, known as the Eagle Mills, which manufactures, from the product of the county, blankets, bannels, tweeds and cassimeres, having capacity to work up from 100,000 to 120,000 pounds of wool annually. The fine water power afforded by the South Santiam has been appropriated by a company, and a canal of 13 miles in length and 25 feet in width, flowing 16,000 cubic feet per minute, has been constructed, leading the water to Albany, where it is applied to manufacturing purposes. The Willamette flows along the western border, and being navigable affords cheap transportation; but superior to this is the iron way of the Oregon and California Railroad, which crosses the county, making business facilities perfect. General prosperity prevails. The wheat crop of 1874 was 1,500,000 bushels, and the wool clip 500,000 pounds. The price of farming land is from $10 to $40 per acre, but in the foothills of the Cascades Government land can be had at the usual rates. Gold, silver and lead are found in the Cascade Range, and at one time a great excitement prevailed, and a rush to the silver mines of Santiam was made, but it has now subsided, and little is done towards developing the mineral resources.

Marion County. Bounded north by Clackamas, east by Clackamas and Wasco, south by Linn, and west by Polk and Yamhill. Area, 1,734 square miles. Assessed valuation of property for 1874, $4,000,000. Population, 11,000. County seat and Capital of the State, Salem. Principal towns: Aurora, Aumsville, Brooks, Butteville, Hubbard, Jefferson, Silverton, Sublimity and Woodburn. The county occupies a central and important position in the great valley of the Willamette, having that beautiful stream along its entire western border, giving it superior commercial advantages which, combined with the rich soil, its manufacturing facilities, its noble forests and mines, render it one of the most prosperous in the State. The southwestern portion, bordering the Willamette, is a broad and level prairie, interspersed with groves of timber, and well adapted to farming. Good Indian corn is raised in this section—but, generally, the climate of Oregon is not favorable to the successful cultivation of that grain. The southern portion of Marion is hilly, interspersed with prairie, and is an excellent wheat-growing section. Locally the different sections of the valley are designated as French Prairie, Howell Prairie, Salem Prairie, and the Santiana Prairie. Two thirds of the entire area is arable and capable of supporting an agricultural population of 100,000, though scarce a twentieth of that number are now engaged in cultivating its fertile and inexhaustible soil. The eastern portion of the county is extremely mountainous—the crest of the Cascade Range being its limits. The North Santiam runs along the southern border—and in its valley is a large area of excellent farming and grazing land. Pudding River is formed from numerous branches rising in the Cascades, and runs northerly through a large and fertile valley. The facilities for marketing the products of the county are furnished by the navigable river along its western border, and by the Oregon and California Railroad which passes through it. Manufacturing is extensively carried on at Salem, Aurora, and other localities—the many mountain streams furnishing abundant power for the purpose. The schools are numerous and well sustained—the county being divided in fifty-five school districts, besides which are three academies and one university. Every village boasts its numerous and neat church edifices, presenting to the stranger evidences of cultivation, refinement, and good society.

Marshfield, Coos Co, P O 4½ miles e of Empire City, is a prosperous and growing town, contiguous to the Newport coal mines, with which it is connected by a narrow gauge railroad of three miles in length, the first of the kind operated by locomotive on the Pacific Coast.
