

firewood and building material, and the Mormon settlements in the valleys of the vicinity furnish the products of the farm and garden in profusion and at low rates. With these many advantages the town has rapidly increased, assuming city proportions as it adopted the name. The great resource is of course the mines. The mineral belt upon which it is founded extends a distance of six miles southeasterly and five miles northwesterly, with a width of about two miles. The principal mines as far as known are the Raymond and Ely, and Meadow Valley, but others have produced large amounts of bullion and innumerable claims pretend to value. The Raymond and Ely was one of the most important mines of the State, and has produced upwards of $10,000,000. The Meadow Valley has also produced several millions, the product of the district from 1871 to 1875 being from two to nearly five millions of dollars annually. The Raymond and Ely paid to its stockholders some $3,000,000 in dividends, but at a depth of about 1,200 feet, where water was first reached, the rich body of ore gave out and explorations are making to find it at greater depths. With the decline in this mine the great interest in the town also declined, but prosperity of a high order continues. A railroad connects the town with Bullionville, 13 miles distant, chiefly used in transporting ores to the mills at that place. The town is laid out in regular order. Meadow Valley and Main being the names of the principal streets. Courts have been established, a Court House, City Hall, theatre, schools and churches built, society is good and order prevails. A line of stages runs daily to Hamilton, carrying passengers, bullion, the mail and express, and stages also run to Salt Lake. Two newspapers, the Record and the Journal, are published daily.
