

Hotel Wentworth

It is an absolute fact that there can never be a surplus of first-class family hotels, for the very simple reason that there are so extremely few which come up to the standard. Anyone who attempts to conduct such a hotel usually falls into one or two extremes. It either becomes too exclusive, and the rates so high as to become prohibitive to the really desirable class of people of limited means, or there is too little care taken in the selection of the guests. This reproach cannot apply to the Hotel Wentworth, for it is essentially a family hotel. Its patrons are of the most desirable. It has all the conveniences and none of the discomforts of the modern home, and its rates are reasonable when the excellent accommodations and splendid table are taken into consideration. It is situated in a pleasant part of the city, on a lofty elevation, which commands a splendid view of miles and miles of the most beautiful land and water scenery in America, the sewerage is consequently excellent. The Wentworth is a new house, but has been recently refitted from top to bottom, and its 125 rooms are provided with the most excellent plumbing, and also with every convenience and modern accessories. The line of street cars which pass every few minutes, give transfers to all parts of the city, north, south, east and west. The Wentworth has already become noted for its excellent table, the rule of its proprietor being to provide all that is best of every thing. To the tourist who is only making a limited visit to San Francisco, or to those who desire a genial and homelike atmosphere we alike commend the Wentworth. Mrs. M. W. Newman, the proprietor, has had years of experience in hotel keeping. We would here mention that she is the sole owner of the hotel, in addition to being its manager, and she therefore pays the greatest attention and keeps all the rooms in the most exquisite order. Those at home or abroad who wish to find a most desirable place or residence will do well to call on or correspond with Mrs. Newman, 617 Bush Street, San Francisco.
